Ball, of Raleigh, in the Washington Star. have never found a botanist who could explain the phenomena, but there is a grove of fir trees on the side of Mount Mitchell, which, when they attain the height of eight or ten feet, begin to twine their branches and form flat tops. They grow in this way until the tops are perhaps 20 feet in diameter, and these have in some instances combined with the tops of other like trees, and a person can walk for a considerable distance upon these tops, They are undoubtedly a species of fir, but wholly unlike the other firs which are plentiful in that section, except in appearance of foliage. I have taken several scientists out to see these trees and have not yet found one

The bored one in this case was a showy young woman who dressed four or five times a day and in the intervals sat about on the piazza and yawned. The other guests always met her curiously, but there was so clearly nothing in common between her and them that she was soon left to herself. One day, apparently because she did not know what to do with the time, she went up Mount Washington. The morning was clear, but in the afternoon there were showers, and she reached the house wet and draggled and tired her hair streaming about her face and her gay hat ruined. One of the guests who happened to meet her as she came One of the greatest natural curiosin gave her a sympathizing glance.

A gray October sky was lowering over the barren when my guide and I entered it, coming suddenly out of the dark meet the varied demands of life in the thick woods. The sun was just going down in a bank of copper-colored mist on the distant horizon's edge. The solitary rock looming before us was the only object that broke the wide, monotonous expanse of the plain. "That," tress of the lonely hunter, whispered, said my guide, "is Peter Pardeau's calling-rock. Many was the moose Peter called up and shot from there, And once, they say, he shot a white moose. Good cheer it meant for us, that night, wet and weary and hungry as we were from a 12-mile walk through the pathless forest. The tight little stove glowed redhot; the freshly cut balsam "browse" in the bunks gave forth its delicious aroma; the moose-steak from the pack simmered in the spider, and from the coffee-pot rose that fragrant steam which every camper associates with the feasts of the outdoor gods. After supper came the pipes and the guide's story of Peter and the white moose, which, for the reader's sake, I must tell in fewer words than the guide used, as he leaned back against the logs, blowing long clouds of smoke across the stove.

It was fully two weeks before he returned. When he did he asked Miss Wilson to bring him the brief in the Bracken case. It was in the late fall and a fire was burning in the open grate. He glanced the brief through and tossed into the blaze.

The girl started and looked at him in

"I have been out there among those ple." he said, regarding her intently. "And I have resigned as counsel in this case. I have learned many things I never dreamed of in the past two weeks. Among them that I need a conscience and a heart to balance what few brains Providence gave me. And I have learned that that conscience and that heart which I need is personified in you. I need you, Miss Wilson-Clara will you help me place my life and my motives on a higher plane?"

The world was scarcely less surprised at Robert Melbourne's resignation from the Bracken law case than at his marriage to his stenographer. But Melbourne had many other surprises in store for the world.
